

You Deserve a Break Today!

I drove by the local McDonald's and had a flashback that really sent me down a rabbit hole. Crazy the thoughts I have sometimes and where those thoughts lead me.

I remember when McDonald's was built and opened in our small (once rural) town a few years back and Bob wanted to go there and eat. I was opposed to it. Never really gave my negative feelings much thought. I just had other places I would rather eat my meal. I love eating out and a fast-food stop doesn't constitute eating out for me. Well, unless it's In-N-Out Burger.

Bob was well into his decline with Dementia, and I was "in charge". I did all the driving and made all the decisions. Bob usually was very happy just to go along for the ride and never balked at what we did. I was always a take charge person but with Bob's decline, I was 110% in charge. At least I was if he wasn't having a total meltdown but that's a story for another day.

Frequently as we drove by McDonald's he would ask to go there. And without any thought, I would just say no and tell him that we would go elsewhere, or we would go home and eat. It was never discussed more than that.

Now today, about 4-5 years later, this haunts me a bit. Why didn't I do what my husband asked? Why did I discount his request repeatedly?

Were there other things that I didn't give Bob any say in? Did I force feed my decisions on him? And why did I think about this many years later? Lots of questions and not a lot of clarity. But in true Susan fashion I decided that if I journaled on this matter, I might get some clarity and move on from the remorse I'm feeling.

I'm a champion for people with Alzheimer's/Dementia. I think I can support their caregivers and give them sound advice on how to walk the minefield that is Alzheimer's/Dementia. One of the things I'm often found to say is to not argue with your loved one. Not to be critical of your loved one's behaviors. To remember they are still the special person they once were even if they are slipping away day by day. I emphasize treating them with the respect and admiration you once felt. You need to remember that they are not aggravating you on purpose. They don't want to be the way they are any more than you want them to have this disease. They are unable to express themselves. They can't explain or argue why they want to go to McDonald's, but now I realize that if they ask for it, it is important to them.

They are counting on their loved one to take care of all their needs and looking back, I think I had room for improvement. Maybe even in all the 41 years of our marriage and not just in the Dementia years. I can see now that Bob might have thought of me as a bossy person and not just a take charge person!

So, my takeaway from my McDonald's flashback moment (that lasted a few days) is that we all need to honor our loved ones—be they friends, siblings, neighbors, spouses. If they are healthy or ill. Whether they are young or old. If someone asks for something or wants to do something, and it just isn't exactly what you want, be willing to compromise and bend. Say yes. Maybe you won't enjoy the meal, but I know you'll enjoy the moment.

My Bob Haiku!

I've been attending a Writer's Workshop at my local library. I'm not really intending to write a book at this point but I'm trying to improve my writing skills for my Bob with one "o" Blog. It's a really enjoyable experience and I will continue to attend if only just to be around the interesting and creative people that I've met there. Retirement and Widowhood open up lots of free time to explore new things in life. This has been a wonderful one of those new adventures.

This Saturday we were given a writing prompt. This is all new territory for me, and I actually thought about sitting this one out. I only write about Bob (and myself) and I haven't ever written on other topics. So given the phrase "Upside Down and Right Side Up" and being asked to write a Haiku right then was daunting. Write a poem and use the Japanese style with phonetic units in a 5-7-5 pattern seemed like I was being asked to walk a tightrope. No can do.

But I did.

And here it is.

And of course, it's about Bob (and myself).

Death is life changing

Is this normal now

Death, grief, and sorrow

Missing you daily

New life does go on

Loving you forever

Memories bring smiles

Photographs & Memories (wouldn't that make a great song title?!)

True confession. I spend quite a bit of time on Facebook social media. I admit it. Not a horrible amount of time where I have carpal tunnel, sore thumbs and a trigger finger but if you're one of my Facebook friends you know I share my life with posts and pictures a bunch. I feel it's a bit like journaling. Or at least that's my rationale. It could possibly be my addictive personality but that's a blog topic for yet another day...

My favorite part of Facebook is Facebook Memories. It's fun to have photo memories pop up each day chronicling events that happened in past years on that same date. I especially love seeing Bob in his healthier days and I am glad that I have the pictures of Bob even in his years of cognitive decline and poor health. I pour over all the pictures and soak in the memories—thinking of the good times and feeling the love! The pictures and attached memories are so needed—a blessed reminder of the wonderful life I had with my hubby. I truly cherish all the memories. Even in the throes of caregiving, I was grateful for Bob. Tired, struggling, frazzled, sad, but happy to be Bob's wife.

Now there's a new thing going on. Bob's been deceased for long enough that now I have new Facebook Memories that don't include him. When these Bob-absent photo memories pop up on Facebook, I'm a bit saddened. I didn't want a life without Bob, and I wanted more time and more memories. But the overall takeaway is that these new Bob-absent photo memories are a reminder that I am continuing to live. Living a new season of life without Bob being physically here. Bob's memory is now my "partner"! (Thanks to author Mitch Albom for that expression)

There were times that I wondered if I would mentally, physically and spiritually survive Bob's illness and passing. I was a wreck in all those aspects. When you're in the thick of it, it is excruciatingly hard and the thought of living a somewhat normal life seems quite impossible. But here I am 2 years and 7+ months later, and I am not only living a "normal" life but leading a happy, thriving, productive, and enjoyable life.

And I have Facebook Memories to prove it!!

Being Honest about Lying!!

I learned so many new things as a caregiver for someone with dementia. Things I never had given much thought to before. Things that I never hoped I would need to learn. Behaviors and skills that seemed almost to go against who I was.

One was a biggie called "therapeutic fibbing". When I first heard this term, I was more than confused. Basically, it means telling little white lies or partial truths to your loved one who has Alzheimer's/Dementia. That was totally against my belief system, and it seemed to go against my principles. But I began to do it. A lot.

When Bob would ask me if he could go to my house for lunch (when we were in our house), I would tell him that I was out of food, and it would be best that we stay at his house (which was our house) and have lunch. It was much easier than trying to convince him that I didn't live elsewhere. He was satisfied. A lie? In a way.

Once Bob didn't drive and had actually had his license taken away, he would ask where his car or his car keys were. Instead of rehashing that he didn't have a car or license anymore, I would tell him that the car was getting a repair taken care of or getting detailed or a friend had borrowed it. I just made up a new story each time he asked. He was satisfied. A lie? In a way.

Bob told the story about all the baseball hats he had. He claimed his parents threw a party for him when he played football for the Chargers (I must have missed that era!). Bob claimed that everyone brought him a hat and that's where his baseball hat collection came from. I agreed and said it was a grand party indeed. He was satisfied. A lie? In a way.

Sometimes Bob would think that an old boss or work associate was joining us for a meeting, and we needed to get to the meeting place. Often it was a story about it being the police chief or a higher up who needed his help on a big case. Instead of explaining that none of this was happening, I would agree and load Bob up in the car and head somewhere for lunch. Sometimes he would forget about the meeting he was supposedly having by the time we got to the restaurant. If he was still going on and on about the meeting with the police officer, I would secretly talk to the waitress and ask her to come tell Bob that he had just gotten a phone call and the police officer wasn't able to come and he would be in touch for another meeting. He was satisfied. A lie? In a way.

Another lesson learned was that there is no blame or guilt once someone is diagnosed with Alzheimer's/Dementia. You can't be so hard on yourself for your behaviors and actions. You just have to give yourself grace. I can't compare being a caregiver to someone with dementia to any other types of caregiving, but I am sure there is no easy caregiving job. I just know in our situation that there were many times that I didn't handle Bob's caregiving with tender loving care. I am sure there were times that I did not look at him with love in my eyes. I'm sure there were times that my voice as harsh and my words were mean. I am sure there were times when my prayers were more for me than for him. Do I regret these things? Do I blame myself or have guilt? No, I don't.

Now that's the biggest lie yet. Of course, I do

My goodness. Bob has been on my mind 24/7 this month. And it's not a bad thing. I think it's because a year ago right now, things were rough. Bob had declined to where he needed help with almost everything. He couldn't hold his spoon to eat or hold his coffee cup without dropping it. He had a terrible time getting into bed and just couldn't figure that out. He would just plop himself into bed and where he landed is where he would sleep. Even if most of his body was hanging off the bed. Once super fastidious, Bob had forgotten how to shave and taking a shower was a very difficult process that he (and I both) dreaded. He was confused over what Fixodent was for and there were times he tried to brush his teeth with his razor. It was so sad to watch the physical decline that most people don't know is associated with Dementia. Yep, the brain just stops being able to tell the body what to do. The body just stops being able to function without the brain directing it.

Bob was on a downhill slide, and it was excruciating to watch. Thinking back to last October/November brings me chills. But it also is a reminder that Bob was not living a life that he would have wanted. Yes, it was time for him to pass and sometimes these memories of the rough times make me realize that I didn't lose a healthy happy Bob, I lost the Bob that was ready to go. Weird as this may sound, that helps a bit. I know how Bob wanted to live and how he was living last October/November was NOT how he would have ever wanted to live. On that issue, I am 100% clear.

But this year, I still have lots of changes to process. I am still not used to my new life without Bob. I'm not miserable. I'm just still trying to sort through my feelings about everything! I can be positive and upbeat and then downtrodden and miserable in the same hour. I can cry at the drop of a hat over a tiny thing or be perfectly content and smile during the most emotional experiences. Yes, I'm a mixed-up mess.

I've read many books about grief— about 5 stages, 10 stages, etc., but I just don't think that those books cover everything. They barely scratch the surface. Just when I think I've worked through most stages, I come across another hurdle or issue. Maybe I'll write my own book! Maybe my book would have 50 stages of grief or more!

So today I take another big step in this grief process that isn't in any of the books I've read. Today I change my Facebook status to widow. Yep, it's finally Facebook official. I know it sounds silly, but my stomach is churning a bit. Dare to move ahead. Here I go.
